

Stem Cells as a New Treatment for Alzheimer's Disease

Screenshot

by targeting the underlying causes, stem cell therapy has the potential to slow, stop or even reverse Alzheimer's disease altogether. As we become older, technologies such as these become even more important: research has shown that the risk of getting Alzheimer's doubles every five years after age 65, and the risk increases by 50 percent after age 85.
